The baker new he kneaded to make more bread before the mourning rush. He looked out the window and watched the sun rise over the see. His assistant was suppose to arrive at too o'clock, but she was running late because her car wouldn't break. "I'll have to get started my self," he sighed, wiping flower off his hands. Just as he put the last tray in the oven, his assistant walked threw the door holding a peace offering-a warm croissant and a big smile.
