The narrow cobblestone street glistened after a sudden summer rain. Bright lanterns hung from wooden beams, casting a golden glow on puddles below. Merchants called out from colorful stalls, their tables piled high with oranges, bolts of cloth, and polished trinkets. A small group of children ran past, laughing as they splashed through the water. In the distance, a tall clock tower loomed above the rooftops, its bells beginning to chime. The air carried the scent of roasted chestnuts mixed with damp earth. Travelers crowded near a horse-drawn carriage, waiting to climb aboard. The entire street hummed with life, as if the rain had awakened it with renewed energy.
