At sunrise, the town square was quiet and still. The stone fountain in the center gurgled softly, and only a few shopkeepers moved about, setting up their stalls. The air smelled faintly of fresh bread from the nearby bakery, and birds hopped lazily along the cobblestones. By midday, however, the scene had transformed. The square buzzed with voices as people crowded around stalls piled high with fruits, spices, and colorful fabrics. Children darted between legs, chasing one another, while musicians played lively tunes near the fountain. The smell of roasted meat and sweet cakes filled the air, and laughter echoed across the square. What had been calm and empty in the morning had become bursting with energy and life.
