The village square stretched out like a wide stone carpet, its center marked by a bubbling fountain where pigeons gathered. To the north, a towering church with stained-glass windows cast long shadows at sunset. On the eastern side, a row of bakeries filled the air with the warm scent of fresh bread, their chimneys puffing tiny clouds of smoke. The western edge was lined with wooden market stalls, bright with fruit and fabrics of every color. South of the square, a cobbled path led to the riverbank, where boats rocked gently on the current. Children played near the fountain, while elders sat on benches beneath tall oak trees. The entire place buzzed with voices, music, and the hum of daily life.
